people in this region ate little or no seafood and both the local soil and water had relatively low amounts of dissolved iodine, resulting in little exposure from locally grown foods or water